402nd earns Maintenance Repair and Overhaul award

BY WAYNE CRENSHAW
wayne.crenshaw.ctr@robins.af.mil

The 402nd Maintenance Wing has been selected to receive the 2010 Maintenance Repair and Overhaul of the Year Award for its C-17 Production Transformation and Logistics Support Integration.

The MRO of the Year awards honor the best MRO and aftermarket entities around the world for pioneering achievements and value-adding accomplishments during the past year. The awards are given annually by Aviation Week and Overhaul & Maintenance magazines.

Brig. Gen. Lee Levy, 402nd MXW commander, said the award is a big accomplishment.

"It's pretty clear to me that it shows our workforce and innovations deliver a quality product with the best of them," he said. "It's a testament to the great work they do."

The awards are given in four categories: Outstanding airline maintenance group; Military center of excellence; Leading independent MRO organization; and Innovative supplier/OEM services provider.

The awards will be presented Tuesday at Aviation Week's MRO Americas Conference and Exhibition in Phoenix, Ariz.

'HEROES' 78th SFS Airmen earn Bronze Star medals

BY WAYNE CRENSHAW
wayne.crenshaw.ctr@robins.af.mil

Two members of the 78th Security Forces Squadron were honored with Bronze Stars last week for their efforts to capture insurgents in Iraq.

Master Sgt. Robert Rose and Master Sgt. David Barber earned the medals for work with the 506th Expeditionary Security Forces Squadron at Kirkuk between November 2008 to May 2009.

Col. Lee-Ann Perkins, commander of the 78th Mission Support Group, officiated at the ceremony April 9. She noted it was the first time she awarded an Airman a Bronze Star in her 23 years in the Air Force.

"That just tells you the magnitude of this recognition," Perkins told those in attendance. "This is not run-of-the-mill stuff. This is amazing and impressive."

According to his citation, Rose led a counter-threat unit consisting of four tactical security teams and a site exploitation team on 135 outside-the-wire missions. The teams identified more than 1,600 insurgents, including seven who were labeled "high-value."

He also "courageously led his teams through an improvised explosive device attack to apprehend an Al Qaeda cell leader," which neutralized "an improvised explosive device cell responsible for numerous attacks in the area."

Barber led teams of Soldiers, Airmen and Iraqi policemen on 131 missions. The teams uncovered five weapons caches containing more than 3,000 pounds of explosives and captured 10 insurgents who had been firing mortars at the base. Overall, Barber is credited with helping end the hostile activity of 90 insurgents.

ACC commander tours Center, 116th facilities

BY WAYNE CRENSHAW
wayne.crenshaw.ctr@robins.af.mil

The commander of Air Combat Command paid a visit April 1 to the 116th Air Control Wing and the Warner Robins Air Logistics Center.

Based at Langley Air Force Base, Va., Air Combat Command is one of eleven major commands in the Air Force and is the primary provider of air combat power for all U.S. military commands.

Gen. William M. Fraser III spent time touring the wing and WR-ALC operations, visiting with both leaders and Airmen. In an interview just before his departure, Fraser discussed the importance of the 116th ACW, which has logged 68,000 flying hours in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"The 116th is critical to what we are doing today in Afghanistan and Iraq," he said. "I really appreciate and value what the team is doing. I had the opportunity to be forward in the theater and see the impact they are having, and it's wonderful to see them on this side as they are training up to go forward again."

Fraser said Airmen under his command are his top prior-

The wisdom of BLSDM

The Base Level Service Delivery Model allows military units at Robins to retrieve certain personnel information over the Web rather than going through the 78th Force Support Squadron.

The Air Force began implementing BLSDM in October 2007. BLSDM allows commanders to conduct certain administrative actions, such as checking on the status of awards, evaluations and deployment schedules, without going through personnelists.

Every unit on base should have someone designated to use BLSDM, said Capt. Alfred Curtis, commander of the 78th FSS Personnel Flight. However, the flight still receives requests which should be handled through the Web.

By using BLSDM, commanders can often get the information they want much faster, said Curtis.

"SEE ME, SAVE ME" RIDE

Hundreds of riders are expected to participate April 23 in Team Robins' third annual motorcycle awareness ride.

The ride, which is part of the "See Me, Save Me" campaign, will begin at about 9 a.m., with a safety briefing for those with base-access at the Motorcycle Safety Range. It will travel through Warner Robins, Perry, Fort Valley and Byron, and end at the Museum of Aviation.

The purpose of the event is to remind drivers that motorcycles and motorcyclists are on the road.

ALTERNATE DISPUTE RESOLUTION Process committed to communication

Some people enjoy quoting from famous movies. If you're one of them, it's possible you may be familiar with a scene in which one actor attributes an action to "a failure to communicate."

That's also true in real life. Some issues which arise in our lives can easily be attributed to a failure to speak, listen or communicate.

The workplace is no different. Respect, understanding and good communication are vital elements of a healthy working environment. However, we sometimes miss the mark.

Employees have several choices to solve problems they have with management or with other employees. One such choice is the Alternative Dispute Resolution program, which is designed to resolve typical workplace disputes before they escalate.

The goal is to channel conflicts into constructive action, where positive changes can be made, thus enhancing mission readiness.

When disputes cannot be resolved in a mutually-acceptable fashion, employees can then turn to a formal complaint and grievance process.

Warner Robins Air Logistics Center and local union leaders have worked hard over the last year to foster trust, confidence and respect through positive labor and management relations.

Hand-in-hand with this intensive effort is a commitment to use formal processes for grievances, contract violations and unfair labor practices, which can result in an outside agency or third party hearing the facts of and making a ruling on cases.

In fact, these leaders encourage employees to seek out solutions at the lowest possible level and, when appropriate, use available systems to resolve workplace disputes.

They know management and employees can achieve a great deal by simply sitting together, understanding and communicating.

And, they hope that some quotes from famous movies remain just that (quotes).

Marines to land at Robins in June

A Marine unit will soon call Robins Air Force Base home.

More than 300 members of Marine Light Attack Helicopter Squadron-773 and Detachment A, Marine Aircraft Group 49, will move here in June from Dobbins Air Reserve Base in Marietta.

"We're really excited to get to Robins and hit the ground running," said Lt. Col. Paul Fagan, commanding officer of HMLA-773. "We hope the Robins community will be excited about having Marines here."

The HMLA-773 is a reserve unit comprised of aviators who fly close support missions. Detachment A, MAG-49, which is commanded by Maj. Mike Johnson, is comprised of about 130 active duty members who will manage the units' facilities and oversee operations.

To accommodate the units, which will bring 18 AH-1W Super Cobras and nine UH-1N Hueys to the base, about $33 million has been invested in local construction costs, including a new hangar and the renovation of several buildings.

The units' transfer was directed in the 2005 Base Realignment and Closure program, or BRAC.

Projects target increased energy efficiency

BY RICK BREWER
78th ABW Public Affairs

Local leaders want to get Team Robins members "buzzing" about saving energy.

Robins members may help in the United States' energy independence efforts through competitions like the one currently being conducted by ConocoPhillips and Penn State at www.conocophillips.com/energyprize, which award people for "original and actionable solutions."

"We hope this fuels workers to think about saving energy," said Tom Scott, president of American Federation of Government Employees Local 987. "It is a win-win for everyone."

Senior base leaders also want you to know there are studies, such as one released Monday by a team of researchers from Georgia Institute of Technology and Duke University, which say "aggressive adoption of energy efficiency" efforts by those in the Southeast can, among other things, help lower individual and business utility bills by $41 billion and save 8.6 billion gallons of freshwater by 2020.

"Everyone should always be looking at ways to help reduce our energy footprint," said Col. Jeff Naviaux, Robins' new energy director.

A number of near-term projects will help Robins do just that, added Naviaux. One is a project to control when and at what intensity Robins' "high mast" lights illuminate. Instead of these lights brightly shining continuously at night when the installation is nearly unoccupied, the lights will be operated more efficiently at three nodes using computer and cellular technology.

Another project involves infrastructure "investment-grade audits" of all 13 million square feet of work space. The audits will look for energy-efficient projects and processes to integrate across the installation.

April is Month of the Military Child and Child Abuse Prevention Month.

That's a lot of recognition of children, isn't it? Maybe that's because we realize the children of today are the parents, teachers and leaders of tomorrow.

We understand when children are raised with love, safety and guidance, they flourish. Conversely, children who are neglected, abused or overly-indulged but ignored, don't.

I have been paying closer attention lately to parents and kids, both on and off base. Essentially, there appears to be less and less direct interaction between parents and children, and more parental communication and "guidance" from behind a cell phone, mp3 player or computer.

The best way to explain my concern is to relate my experience at a local mall a couple of weeks ago. I had taken my soon-to-be 16-year-old daughter (and all of my cash) to go "pre-birthday shopping" (a phenomenon not yet discovered when I was 16).

As I sat on a bench outside a store waiting for her, I couldn't help but smile at a little girl, maybe four years old, who was busy "practicing" the skill of shoe tying.

Biting her lip, she worked on tying, then untying, tying, then untying — while her mother texted on a cell phone.

Suddenly, she called out "Mommy, look! I did it! I tied my shoe!"

Grinning up at her mother, she waited with a totally, shiny face for her mom to acknowledge the hard work and mastery of this new skill.

Never breaking eye contact with her cell phone, her mom absently replied, "That's great, honey."

The little girl persisted. "No, mommy, look. Look at my shoe!"

Still, mom texted, this time offering a less interested, "Uh huh, that's great."

Needless to say, the little girl's joy quickly evaporated.

I didn't know the little girl, but I wanted to scoop her up and tell her what an awesome job she had done, and that I was very proud of her.

But that's just one example.

I regularly see otherwise good parents — great parents, even — who are making a big mistake by parenting their children from behind cell phones.

What possible validation can a child feel when she or he looks into mom's or dad's eyes, but can't make contact because the Internet or a text message is more important?

Think hard, because your child — the one who it seems will be in diapers forever or is just so clingy — will one day be independent.

Form your relationship now, and realize you build the foundation of his or her self-esteem today, when he or she is learning to tie shoelaces.

Do the right thing. Put the cell phone down. Stop texting. Turn off the computer. Turn to your children and look at them, face to face.

Be the parent who is "there" when needed. You don't get a second chance.

— Commentary by Paula Tracy, Family Advocacy, Keesler Air Force Base, Miss.

SUGGESTIONS FOR VISITORS' CENTER

In my 26 years in the United States Air Force, I have seen good and questionable representation at installation visitors centers.

I've been very pleased with the professionalism and support from the individuals who work at the Robins Visitors' Center. They seem to always be in good spirits no matter the task at hand and the backlog of customers.

I know the budget is tight and spending is not what it is used to be. However, I would like you to entertain the idea of displaying some type of visual display screen which will display the names of the parties who have logged in and are awaiting service from the visitors' center personnel. I have seen these types of displays work wonderfully at military personnel flight, military pay and customer service centers. At those locations, you sign in on the computer, similar to what is already being used, and your name shows up on the display board so you know what order you will be called.

This would serve three purposes — visual display would help out those veterans or seniors who have hearing disabilities, control the waiting in line of personnel when they could grab a chair and relax, and lastly, personnel like myself who escort individuals onto the installation for various work-related business can look on the visual display and see if their party has arrived. If a visual display would be a security issue, then could there be some way the escort can check a computer or monitor at the visitors' center and see who has signed in?

COL. BUHLER RESPONDS:

Thank you for your kind comments about our visitors' center staff. These professionals definitely play a critical role in representing the base and maintaining a high standard of security. In addition, the information boards you mentioned do make a difference. In fact, the visitors' center staff also noted the need for this system and we have funded a project to install the system. Thanks again for writing.

“We’ve got to do everything we can to take care of our Airmen,” he said. “We are a nation at war and we’ve got to make sure they are trained and equipped to perform the mission.”

With the high ops tempo of the 116th, Fraser said supplying the wing with proper resources is always a priority. Those resources not only include dollars, but personnel as well. The command’s partnership with the Air National Guard is critical to meeting the personnel requirement, he said.

Fraser also discussed the importance of the WR-ALC in keeping the Air Force’s aging aircraft in combat-ready condition.

“The Center is a critical component in keeping safe, reliable aircraft flying,” he said. “In today’s environment it’s absolutely vital that we properly maintain our current assets, and the men and women here do just that.”

He closed by offering his gratitude to those who serve here.

“I want to thank all of the Airmen and civilians who are doing a great job here at Robins and their families for the sacrifices that they make,” he said. “It’s a huge base with huge a mission.”
